Sandra's journey began when she found herself unable to attend work yet again because of bruises from a beating. She decided that day to take her two young sons and leave, not knowing that a far worse ordeal was about to begin. Not only did Sandra's husband stalk them, but he drew in members of his family — some of whom had law enforcement connections — to participate in the harassment — making for a frightening day-to-day existence. Her abuser's acts of fear and intimidation seemed endless and after one incident when he dropped a dead animal through her mail slot, a police officer handed Sandra a card with Family Shelter's hotline number and said, "I think you need to call these people."

"When you leave the relationship, that is the most dangerous time, because the abuser will stalk you."

"Until that day," Sandra continued, "I thought there was no hope for me and I couldn't believe I found an organization that cared so much about me. I really changed inside after that day." The kind of fear and intimidation endured by Sandra and her two sons is a life no one would wish for anyone. But it's all around us — right in our community.

Once that first call is made to our hotline, victims of domestic abuse find a whole new world of programs and services to help them as well as their children work through their fears and anxiety. This is important work. One call can change — or even save a life and you can help.
